By the time Girija reached the camp site, it was nine-thirty; but he rested a few minutes before starting work. He had calculated beforehand that it would take him less than two hours to move all the boxes to the cane thicket, and was determined to reserve his strength as much as possible. That's how he was taught in MI5 – save your energy. The hardest part of the job would come on the third night, and he must be prepared for that.

He had solved the problem of handling the boxes, almost by accident. At intervals, Mr. Wright received catalogues from a mail order house in Singapore, and in one of them Girija had seen a device that had interested him. It was a gadget for those with heavy suitcases who did not wish to hire porters. It consisted of a strap attached to a bracket with two small trolley wheels mounted on it. The strap was fastened lengthwise round the suitcase, with the wheels at one corner. There was a handle on the strap. The owner of the suitcases simply grasped the handle and walked along, trailing the case behind him, with half of the weight of it carried on the trolley wheels. The price was six dollars.

Girija had sent for one, and when the parcel arrived, he started to experiment. The thing worked on firm ground; but up at the camp site, and with a heavy box of rifles, the small wheels sank into the spongy surface of the hillside and were useless. Larger wheels with broader tyres were needed. He had found them eventually on the estate. Before the Wright children had been sent away to school in England, one of them had had a scooter. It had been left in Mr. Wright's garage, and Girija had had no difficulty in removing the wheels. Mounted on an axle made out of a spare jack handle, they worked quite well.

The transfer to the cane thicket was completed by midnight, and Girija began the journey back. In spite of his resolve to conserve his energies, he was tired, and realised that he could no longer rely upon his wits to see him through. Now, it would be a question of stamina.

There was a compensation. As his weariness increased, his fears seemed to diminish. By the time he had completed the next night's work, he had forgotten about leopards from the jungle, and feared the dark track from the stream bed to the tin workings only because it threatened his powers of endurance.

The nine boxes containing the rifles were the most awkward to handle, and only one could be moved at a time. It required twenty stumbling journeys each way to shift all the boxes, and the final move from the stream bed to the oil depository took five and a half hours. When he had secured the padlock he sank down on the ground in a state of collapse. It was another hour before he could summon the strength to get on his bicycle and ride back to the estate; and only the fear of being seen returning to the estate compound at daybreak before he had had time to wash and put on clean clothes, drove him to make that final effort.
